Excerpt: .everybody with such suddenness that a roar of laughter convulsed the court. The two dogs had got so irretrievably mixed up in the fight that now no one could tell one from the other. When order was restored (Bell and Devine had nearly come to blows) the RM. decided to remand the case for a week. Bail was allowed McFarlane, which Devine readily found. One of the dogs, the one which could perform the trick, was ordered to have a collar put on for distinction, and both were given in charge of the lock-up keeper. The enquiry had simply complicated matters. Baines dog was identified, but nobody could say for certain at which place it had been found. Bell and Devine were, of course, equally positive, but that was mere party feeling. Most people believed in McFarlane s innocence, but Bell vowed that he would bring the murder home to him. Can you recall anything suspicious the night you passed Baines? said Devine to McFarlane, as they went out after signing the bail bonds. No, sir. He had hobbled his horses out and was lighting a fire. I got off, lit my pipe, and stopped yarning; for about twenty minutes. Then I went on to Seldon Downs. And from there? I came to Boolah by Thirglemere and Bingleedoon. I had been here about two hours when I recognised the dog, and directly after I had coaxed him to follow me I was arrested. From...
